

ERNESTO - Camila.

CAMILA - Hello. So, what have you got?

ERNESTO - That trawling company you want to quietly buy. Gulf of Mexico.

CAMILA - Yes.

ERNESTO - They're willing to sell. Hell, they're practically willing to give it away. Two of their boats are in dry dock for repairs, and they can't afford to fix them. The other two are barely seaworthy.

They got three bank loans. Two sisters run it now for the mother. She's sick. She's got cancer. She's not long for this world. They're looking to get out, move back to Cincinnati where their brother is.

CAMILA - And you got all that in just 24 hours?

ERNESTO - Yeah. I like to dig.

CAMILA - I can see that.

ERNESTO - However sometimes you find things you don't expect. Your husband, for example, has his big toe stuck in most of the shipping in the gulf, and I think we both understand what he's shipping, and it's not swordfish. You neglected to tell me that.

CAMILA - Because it's not relevant.

ERNESTO - Ah, when you said you wanted to keep this from your husband it was because of this fact. Not because you're trying to hide a little something off the books for yourself.

CAMILA - I never said I was trying to hide a little something off the books.

ERNESTO - Yes, but you led me to believe that that was the case.

CAMILA - You have a history in asset distribution. It's not my fault that most of that business is between husbands and wives, and you just assumed that it was my case too.

ERNESTO - When I agreed to do this, I didn't mean antagonizing one of the largest businessmen in Sinaloa.

I don't get my hands dirty.

CAMILA - Oh, but your hands are not dirty, just your fingernails.

ERNESTO - There was a fisherman in the region. He had three boats. He complained about some of the other boats violating harbor passage rules without penalty. The next week, they found some of him most of him in an oil barrel. Now I believe you can probably buy his company too. Guess whose boats were violating the rules.

CAMILA - Everything my husband has, I helped him build. So if you're afraid of him, you have to be afraid of me too. He won't know what happened until it's too late. I need boats for shipping. And all you need to know is that I'm fortifying my business in a large and meaningful way. And that by the time he figures that out, he's gonna have bigger problems on his plate than the lawyer that quietly filed shell corp documents, believe me...You said you work on percentages, right? That's what you said? For your loyalty, I'm willing to give you a piece of whatever I bring. And let me make one thing clear. Even the smallest percentage number, the one that's running through your head right now, the one you're hoping I will agree to, even if you cut that number in half, and then cut it in half once more, you would be able not only to lease an entire floor here, but to buy the whole damn building.
